The King’s English has much to look forward to in 2015. To begin with, after a 15-year apprenticeship, first as bookseller, then as events coordinator, and, for the past eight years as store manager, Anne Holman has become a full partner in the bookshop. Putting the partnership on paper is really only a formality, though. Over those years she’s taken enthusiastic ownership of every role she’s played at TKE. She’s demonstrated her competence in all aspects of this crazy, complex business of bookselling and has been my de facto partner in decision-making, both the tough and the creative ones, bringing her vast knowledge of bookselling and publishing (not to mention her outsized sense of humor) to bear on not only our store but our regional booksellers association, Mountains and Plains Independent Booksellers Association. Anne’s just been elected President of this group, which includes not just states in the Rockies and the South-west, but in Texas and Oklahoma as well. Her investment in TKE and in the business of books is extraordinary. We not only love and value Anne, we’re very proud of her.

There are books to look forward to in the coming year as well, of course. Those you’ll read about in this issue, from the likes of Nick Hornby and Ali Smith to two amazing debut titles, The Secret Wisdom of the Earth and The Extraordinary Journey of the Fakir Who Got Trapped in an Ikea Wardrobe. Also, giving you a peek into the future, an astonishing new novel by Kazuo Ishiguro (the best he’s ever done, in this reader’s opinion) will be coming in March; a new Toni Morrison we’re all eager to get our hands on will publish in April; and, perhaps best of all, a final and blissfully good novel by our beloved Kent Haruf, who died recently, will be out this May. What better gift could he have left us? (Continued on page 2)

We mourn Kent Haruf and we mourn Mark Strand, two literary icons who died within a day of one another last November. Each left a huge legacy. In Mark Strand’s Collected Poems, that legacy is a stunning body of work to savor—the work of the lifetime of one of the major poets of our time—and in Kent’s case, along with all of the other wonderful Holt, Colorado novels there was Benediction which not only foreshadowed his own death but illuminates both the process of death and the value of life in unforgettable ways. We are profoundly thankful to Mark and to Kent, both of whom loved TKE. Each shed light on our world, and we will miss them sorely—but will keep their work alive on our shelves and in our hearts and your hands.

We are thankful for other things as well, chief among them the support of all of you. You’ve been steadfast through thick and thin over the years but never so wholeheartedly—or vocally—as this year. You’ve flocked into our store in droves, communed with our booksellers, bought books by the stacks and touched our hearts with your visible love of and support for us and the community we all share—not to mention for books! You’ll never know how much you mean to us or how grateful we are.

Speaking of grateful, we have been the recipient of a couple of astonishing acts of kindness, both highly visible, inside and outside our doors. The first was anonymous: noticing our rather shabby exterior (Pat Bagley’s Mockingjays peeling off the walls along with flakes of paint and plaster) which we were saving (slowly) to repair, some bighearted soul hired a painter and put him to work. One day we were sliding from shabby gentility into just plain shabby, the next our exterior was crisp and clean and newly born as the new year. So, dear anonymous customer, a heartfelt thank you. One day when we can, we will pay your kindness forward.

And one more thank you to James Patterson whose grant for TKE’s children’s room has raised its ceiling, opened up old clear-story windows, and will soon give birth to an Aspen Tree (Utah’s state tree, remember?) in the room’s heart. After a deliberate work slow-down in December to make sure our construction didn’t interfere with your browsing for books for all the kids on your holiday list, we’re back at it; we expect the project will soon be finished—complete with wheels on our shelves and a drop-down projection screen on our wall to create a wonderful space for events.

We all have much to be thankful for in this too-often dark world. Books will continue to shine light in dark corners in 2015, just as Anthony Doerr’s All the Light We Cannot See did last year (the 1,000+ copies TKE has sold, and similar enthusiastic support from independent bookstores all over the country, helped to propel it to #1 on the New York Times bestseller list). We are thankful to Anthony Doerr and to all the other authors who have written and continue to write books that help us to see, to the publishers who have the vision to recognize the best of them, and to you the readers who hold us all in your hands.

In Our Poetry Room

In the Hard By Bookshop

One evening, sitting alone in The King’s English literary/poetry room with a stack of books on my lap, Mark Strand’s poetry simply fell to the floor behind me and presented itself—a lovely bilingual edition. I was smitten. Anonymous

Barbara Hoagland, who became a full partner at TKE in 1987, was an invaluable part of the bookshop for many years. The fact that we were in many ways opposites made her presence all the more important. As an example, I would buy books from publishers with fervid enthusiasm, seldom considering their cost, while Barbara costed out every order we made, reminding me constantly that bill-paying was an important part of the business. Although we both loved mysteries, fiction was and remains my first love. Barbara, on the other hand, read nonfiction—consumed it in fact. I wrote long complicated sometimes weepy blurbs. Hers were short and crisp and often funny. We were, in fact, perfect partners. Her status at TKE changed to silent partner a decade ago when her husband Skip retired and they began to travel, but she still reads voraciously and writes her crisp blurbs from afar. She will continue to do so, although Anne, who replaced her in the shop years ago (and who is likewise possessed of a wonderful, if slightly less wicked sense of humor), has officially acquired her stock in TKE. We're all family at the bookshop, and Barbara Hoagland's revered place in that family will never change. I'll always hear her voice reminding me (thank God) that bills need to be paid, and I still talk to her weekly—and invariably end up laughing.

Saying Hello Means Saying Goodbye (but not really)

By Anne Holman

Here at TKE we believe a good book makes a great Valentine. This year we have Nick Hornby's new novel Funny Girl. Witty and insightful, Hornby never fails to find the humor and the humanity in his characters. And if you loved The Rosie Project, you'll be happy to know Don and Rosie are back and baby makes three in The Rosie Effect! On a contemplative note, Thich Nhat Hanh has a new series of short books including How to Love. It can be complicated, love. Remember The Transit of Venus, Possession, Love in the Time of Cholera, and The House of the Spirits? And think of all the older titles we've loved over the years: Anna Karenina, The End of the Affair, Madame Bovary, On Chesil Beach...oh wait, those may be better examples of love gone astray. How about Pride and Prejudice, A Room with a View, Cinnamon and Gunpowder, and of course my favorite love story of all time, Outlander. What's your favorite love story?
The Secret Wisdom of the Earth, Christopher Scotten

Seen through the eyes of 14-year-old Kevin, Medgar, Kentucky comes alive as a melting pot of the best and the worst of coal-dependent Appalachia in the late 1980s. Mountain top removal mining is dividing the town into those who need the jobs and those who recognize that mountains can’t be rebuilt. Kevin and his mother have come “home” to live with his grandfather, Pops, and Audy Ray, Popp’s housekeeper, in the wake of Kevin’s little brother’s death. While his mother spends the summer prostrate and grieving, Kevin accompanies Pops on his large animal veterinary appointments. With each new character he meets, Kevin learns hard, wonderful lessons about the nature of good and evil that can coexist in each person. The Secret Wisdom of the Earth is a coming-of-age story and so much more. – Anne Holman, Grand Central, $26

How to Be Both, Ali Smith

Georgie’s mother exists only in the past tense. She’s dead, and Georgie’s grief is all-consuming—except when she slips into the present tense and is suddenly reliving a witty, words-as-weapons confrontation: lippy teenage daughter versus sophisticated, highly-educated mom. Witticisms fly, sarcasm abounds, doors slam, and sometimes the whole scene melts into laughter. But then Georgie is back in the present and her Mom is once again past tense. Gone. We slip-slide again into time past as George, her brother, and their mother head for Italy in pursuit of a painting—the middle panel of a fresco by a 15th century Renaissance artist. Before long the reader is flung back to that time and to Francescho del Cossa, the artist whose fresco by a 15th century Renaissance artist. The Extraordinary Journey of the Fakir Who Got Trapped in an Ikea Wardrobe, Romain Puértolas

Ajatashatru Oghash Rathod, the fakir, flies from Rajasthan, India, to Paris to purchase the Hertsjyrbik bed of nails advertised for a mere €99 by IKEA. Unfortunately (but fortunately for the reader), that model is out of stock until the next morning, and Aja opts to spend the night in the “bedroom” section of the giant store. And so our fakir’s adventure begins. In a wild series of mistaken identities, misunderstandings, and pure mishaps, he ends up traveling all over Western Europe (and Africa!) in a variety of contraptions that include a hot air balloon. What could seem contrived in less capable hands is instead a fast-paced, satiric fable that makes us laugh out loud one minute, cheer the next. Guaranteed to light up the dark days of winter. – Anne Holman, Knopf, $25

Funny Girl, Nick Hornby

Nick Hornby’s Funny Girl is not sad-funny like the “Funny Girl” of Streisand fame but sunny funny. It’s not just that Barbara, the protagonist, is funny, it’s that she wants the world to know it. She’s grown up listening to “I Love Lucy” on the tube and wants to be Lucille Ball. To make people laugh. The fact that most people—or at least most men—are only interested in Barbara’s shape, which is statuesque, and her pretty face, makes her mad. But she’s determined, and it comes as no surprise to the reader when she lands her dream job. Two playwrights, one openly gay—or at least as open as anyone could be in 1964 London—and one uncertain about his sexuality, have penned a successful sitcom and are trying to write another. The highs and lows of said sitcom, which is the perfect vehicle for Barbara’s talent, is the stuff of this often riotous and as often touching book. Hornby has a knack for softening us up with laughter and then delivering some home truths. No one escapes his scalpel in Funny Girl, but the reader walks away laughing nonetheless. And this time of year we can all use a laugh. – Betsy Burton, Riverside, $27.95

If I Fall, If I Die, Michael Christie

A tangled skein of friendship and fear, boyhood, parenthood, humor, love and death are threaded together with gorgeous prose in this startling, soul-rattling debut novel. Will has never been Outside. For as long as he can remember his life has consisted of meals his mother cooks in the slow cooker, laundry he does in the basement where she’s afraid to venture, long hours spent painting what she deems his masterpieces. When, one day, he finally decides to brave the unknown world beyond their front door, she is terrified, but he goes despite her pleas. His first foray into the wilderness of the unknown is brief and traumatic but also enticing. Before long, he goes again. And again. What he ultimately finds outside their walls, and what he discovers about his loving but agoraphobic mother, is the stuff of this wildly inventive, beautifully written, weird and wonderful tale. – Betsy Burton, Hogarth, $25

Against the Country, Ben Metcalf

A “loose, baggy monster” kind of novel in the Southern tradition, Against the Country recalls Faulkner and Flannery O’Connor in terms of atmosphere and milieu, yet the narrator’s voice and willingness to play with concepts of narrative truth bring Metcalf’s novel closer to the work of someone like Laurence Sterne. It is a novel about style and voice rather than story and character, yet it is full of both stories and characters, and it manages to remain coherent and compelling though it lacks a traditional plotline to hold it together. (And yet, if there is a plot here, it is one of the oldest and most traditional: a man confronts his father.) There is no traditional dialogue either, so it reads like a long monologue with many false starts and even more false endings. Characters other than the narrator are similarly ghostlike—we come to know the narrator’s family throughout the novel, but only his father is named and even then but once. The novel may be a challenge to describe but it’s a pleasure to read. Metcalf’s writing possesses verve, especially in his metaphors, and a sense of humor that allow the narrative to remain buoyant atop the black water of its unique Southern existentialism.

West of Sunset, Stewart O’Nan

F. Scott Fitzgerald is tired. He’s just been to visit Zelda and as usual it hasn’t gone well. He needs to make money—to support her and their daughter Scottie. Now in Hollywood, one of his old haunts, he’s trying to leave the past behind—and to stay on the wagon so he can get some work done, something hard to do in that particular town. Stewart O’Nan’s compassionate and complex portrait of one of the greatest literary icons of our time manages to evoke Hollywood’s glitter and wit while at the same time bringing us inside the mind and heart of a man torn—torn between his sense of duty to his old love, his troubled wife Zelda, his blooming love for Sheila Graham, her love/hate relationship with him due to his love/hate relationship with alcohol, and perhaps most touching of all, his love for his daughter. What emerges from the stew of Fitzgerald’s need is a masterful portrayal of a man of contradictions: weak yet utterly heroic, the ultimate insider emerges from the stew of Fitzgerald’s need is a masterful portrayal of a man of contradictions: weak yet utterly heroic, the ultimate insider

The Lost Domain, Henri Alain-Fournier

When Augustin Meaulnes highjacks a horse and wagon from his boarding school and roars off into the French countryside, he has no idea how he will be forever changed by what he finds. This little-known 1913 French classic chronicles the last (and lost) childhood days of two boys and their desperate and futile efforts to try to rediscover the mystical realms of youth. Delicately written, this heartbreaking rendering of how the fantasy of childhood slips slowly away from us all is available again in a lovely cloth centenary edition.

Etta and Otto and Russell and James, Emma Hoop

During the Great Depression, Etta finds a job teaching in a one-room school in the middle of the Alberta prairie. Otto and Russell are two of her older students and the three form a single unit, indivisible by life’s ups and downs, marriage, war, peace and old age in this wonderful novel that is part history, part personal journey, part love story, part fable. James, a talking coyote, accompanies Etta on her trek by foot, begun at the age of 83, to see the Atlantic Ocean. The two find an easy companionship as they make their way across Canada to the ocean Etta has so longed to see, while Russell and Otto wait anxiously at home for her safe return.

Black River, S. M. Hulse

Crippled by violence that had occurred in a prison riot years before, Wesley is returning home to Black River with his wife Claire’s ashes. While there, Wesley, who had once worked as guard at the prison, has to decide whether to testify at a parole hearing against the man who tortured him for 39 agonizing hours, breaking his fingers one by one. Those fingers had connected Wesley to his fiddle and to the music that had fed his soul for most of his life. He pulls up at the house of his stepson Dennis, uncertain of his welcome, and finds that the bad blood that had existed between the two is still on the boil. So begins an extraordinary novel that moves forward quietly, its language muted, its action mostly slipping along in a relatively calm stream of memory. That calm is surface-deep; beneath it a roil of tortured emotions surge and eddy, gathering into a current that threatens all in its wake. Hulse is clear about the strength of that current but also about the possibilities that love and forgiveness can offer.

Mobile Library, David Whitehouse

Val, mother of Rosa, cleans the town’s mobile library for a living. Rosa has disabilities that make her the butt of bullying at school. She’s befriended by Bobby who spends his time collecting artifacts that prove his mother really did exist, while co-existing with his abusive stepfather. Bobby is abused in the schoolyard as well as at home, which is the reason his friend Sunny is determined to turn himself into a cyborg; he wants to be invincible so that he can protect Bobby. What better refuge could this ragtag group of outcasts have than a bookmobile, a place to escape the real world and to find solace and connection in the books that line the library shelves—and in each other? When, after far too many intentional accidents, Sunny is forced to move, Bobby lands in

A Spool of Blue Thread, Anne Tyler

Anne Tyler is a master at showing us what lies just beneath the surface of a “typical” American family. As we weave back and forth between three generations of the Whitshank clan, it’s in the small details where we learn who they are as opposed to who they think they are. We meet Junior (!) who has tried to escape his Appalachian childhood only to be pursued by Linnie Mae right into marriage. And his son Red, who is just Red, and comfortable in his skin. Red’s wife Abby is a central character, a keeper of secrets and promises. And of their four children. Denny seems the most secretive and detached, but why? Tyler’s characters are like people I know in real life, their concerns and complexities addictively involving because they seem so true.

NONFICTION

Leaving Before the Rains Come, Alexandra Fuller

A starred review in Booklist describes Ms. Fuller’s newest book as, “powerful, raw and painful.” It is all of that. Yet told with her inimitable humor, what could otherwise be unrelenting sadness is mitigated by her ability to laugh at some of the less-than-funny situations in which she found herself—both as a child growing up and later as an adult during the eventual dissolution of her marriage. Possessed of the same piercing observations apparent in her other nonfiction, Fuller’s latest book is a much more personal look into her life and those of her husband Charlie and their children. Her love of life and place is apparent on every page.

Alphabetical: How Every Letter Tells a Story, Michael Rosen

From whence did our alphabet come? Who had the bright idea that each sound could be codified in the form of a squiggle? And why is that squiggle different from culture to culture and continent to continent? Why do letters disappear? And what is all that about E? And then there is N which stimulated Rosen to write about nonsense poems, always a fascinating subject. Everything you ever wanted to know about the alphabet is riffed, described, counted, sounded, rhymed and pondereded in one of the most delightful books ever on the whys and wherefores of written language by the author of the multiple award-winning children’s book We’re Going on a Bear Hunt.

– Kathy Ashton, Counterpoint/PGW, $25

The Train to Crystal City, Jan Jarboe Russell

Crystal City, Texas was the site of the most unique American internment camp during World War II. Its inhabitants were families of interned Japanese, Italians and Germans who were essentially hostages for what was intended to be a prisoner exchange program. The majority of the children of the internees were American-born and yet they were by association deemed enemy aliens. As the war progressed and the prisoner exchange program was enacted, these families were “repatriated” to their country of origin in exchange for American prisoners. That many of those repatriated did not speak the language and had no association with Japan or Germany was of little concern as they were merely pawns in a chess game conceived and run by the U.S. Government. Russell has done a terrific job of personalizing the horrors of the internment system and the spirit of those who lived and flourished through it.

My Friend, Our Friend: Emma Lou Thayne by Anne Holman

A beloved bookshop friend and author, Emma Lou Thayne passed away on December 6, 2014. We’ve sold her books ever since we opened our doors in 1977, most recently, The Place of Knowing. It’s an engaging memoir of Emma Lou’s life; filled with poetry and reflections. Although I’d only known Emma Lou for the past 10 years, she made me feel like I’d been a dear friend forever. I’d often drive over to her house with a box of books for her to sign and we would sit at her kitchen table and visit while she personalized books for her many, many friends and fans. She made people happy; she made all the booksellers at TKE happy; she made me happy.

– Barbara Holman
It's What I Do, Lynsey Addario

Beginning in 2000, Addario has traveled the world over as a woman photojournalist, documenting the stories of people and their hardships. She has been witness to as well as recorder of the effects of war in Afghanistan, Iraq, Libya, Somalia, Pakistan, and Gaza to name a few. Her many courageous colleagues include Dexter Filbin, Stephen Farrell, Tyler Hicks and Tim Hetherington (now deceased). These professionals sacrifice dearly to bring to the public the effects of war on the military and civilians alike. Addario regularly submits her work to The New York Times and National Geographic. I will be on the lookout for her work in the future with gratitude and will wish her safety throughout her endeavors. – Sue Fleming, Norton, $29.95

Being Mortal: Medicine and What Matters in the End, Atul Gawande

Although a book about death, Being Mortal is also a book about life—about recognizing illness for what it is, and then making informed decisions about its consequences on all our lives. Gawande, a surgeon, a writer and something of a philosopher, has learned to widen his focus beyond the medical view, recognizing that sometimes life at any cost is not life worth living. He begins first with the topic of aging, taking us on the historical arc from dying at home in early society to the birth of hospitals and nursing homes, the gradual realization that such institutions can be prison-like and that people shouldn’t be forced to live in rhythms that suit their caregivers. He takes us through the movement to assisted living establishments and then on to newer, smaller residences which are more intimate, more homelike—and more respectful of quality of life. Insisting that everyone should be the author of his or her own life, he gives us not only a rationale for making that happen but also the tools for at least beginning to do so. Moving on to the topic of death, he again gives us overview—not just of the mortal consequences of illness, but of the choices that occur as one travels in death’s direction, the ways to make those choices clear—both to the patient and to his or her family. In the process he addresses not only the fear of death, but also the conversations that can defang that fear, replacing it with peace, with dignity, and with free will. Being Mortal is groundbreaking—like Kent’s Haruf’s Benediction, it’s a book everyone should read. – Betsy Burton, Metropolitan Books, $26

Descent, Tim Johnston

The disappearance of a child is every parent’s worst nightmare. The Courtlands are a typical American family vacationing in Colorado before 18-year-old Caitlin leaves for college in Wisconsin on a full scholarship for track and field. The trip to the Rockies is her graduation gift and all she wants to do is run, at high altitude, to her heart’s content. And then everything goes wrong. What’s fascinating about this mystery is the way we get into each of the main characters’ heads and feel his or her pain and confusion. There are a few cracks in this outwardly happy family, and Caitlin’s disappearance pushes each of them further inside themselves and away from one another. We follow them down their very separate paths and, at the same time, are privy to Caitlin’s story as well. Once you get to the end of this frightening novel, you’ll look up and realize you stayed up all night. It’s that good. – Anne Holman, Algonquin, $25.95

The Unquiet Dead, Ausma Zehanat Khan

The Unquiet Dead may at first glance appear to be a typical if well-written mystery. It begins with a death and a question: the death, a fatal plunge from a Canadian cliff-top, the question, was now-dead Christopher Drayton pushed, did he jump, or was his death an accident? And why has an old friend at the Justice Department asked Muslim detective Esa Khattak, whose division involves community relations, not homicide, to lead the investigation? Fragmentary clues begin to appear in beheaded scraps of letters in Drayton’s library—scrap of story that head each chapter of the book and that float through its text like faded memories. Amassing over the course of the novel, they gradually coalesce into the picture of war-torn Bosnia. And suddenly Esä’s assignment begins to make sense as Drayton’s real identity emerges from the shadows. Just as suddenly we realize this was not an accident, Macleod switches into his inspector mode and Rutledge finds himself involved in a series of unexplained murders—murders he must solve before he reports to duty on the Western Front. Although the crimes take place in various towns, they have a common thread—each victim once lived in Bristol. For fans of Charles Todd mysteries, this book takes place prior to Rutledge’s time in France and prior to his meeting with the Scottish Highlander. Readers will have “ah ha” moments when they realize just how the pieces of all 16 previous mysteries relate to Rutledge’s past. – Wendy Foster Leigh, William Morrow, $26.99

The Chessmen, Peter May

Inspector Fin Macleod is now settled on the Isle of Lewis making a new life out of an old one in the final volume of the Lewis trilogy. He finds his new position as head of security for a local landowner baffling when he’s confronted with conflicts of landowner vs. poachers and the conflicts of a newly found son and lover. While renewing acquaintance with a repeat poacher who happens to be an old friend, a “bog burst” drains a loch of water exposing the skeleton of a light aircraft containing the body of a man they both knew. Musician Roddy Mackenzie had disappeared over 17 years ago and, realizing this was not an accident, Macleod switches into his inspector mode only to discover that ancient rivalries and feuds which have been buried with the aircraft are now surfacing. The Chessmen are a group of 12th century chess pieces found on the island and now in the British Museum and the Museum of Scotland—chessmen of which Fin’s old friend has carved replicas for an island celebration. They represent the emotions, jealousies, feuds of the islanders who readers of this trilogy by now know and care about. The Chessmen rounds out May’s picture of island life with all its strengths and weaknesses. Read The Blackhouse and The Lewis Man first to fully realize the power of the Lewis trilogy. – Wendy Foster Leigh, Quercus, $26.99

The Whites, Richard Price (writing as Harry Brandt)

A quality revenge thriller is always a confrontation with the limits of human forgiveness. What can you live with? What keeps you up at night? For Billy Graves and his friends, a tight group of mostly retired detectives who call themselves the Wild Geese, it’s the Whites. The ones who got away. Every Goose has his or her own White, a slick perp who never paid for his crimes, and even decades after the first Goose retired they still talk about the Whites like fresh wounds when they go out for drinks. They represent a moral debt left unpaid to the victims and their families and to hear these cops tell it, no end would be too cruel for any one of the Whites. Which is why when they start turning up dead, Billy—the only member of the Wild Geese still on the force—begins to suspect the worst of his best friends. At the same time, a violent stalker emerges and targets Billy's family in his quest to satisfy a lifetime vendetta against Billy's wife Carmen. As Graves uncovers the darkest secrets of his most intimate companions, he fights through a classically noir moral quandary: loyalty to family and friends, or loyalty to some higher law that would require you to sacrifice your family and friends? On the other side of the fight, Billy Graves learns what everyone else in his life seems to already know—that some moral debts can never be cleared while others can never be claimed. – Kenneth Loosli, Henry Holt, $28

As Chimney Sweepers Come to Dust: A Flavia de Luce Novel, Alan Bradley
Flavia has been sent to an upper-crust Canadian finishing school where her mother's academic and leadership skills have secured her place on the school's wall of fame. The rooms are identified by the names of former students rather than numbers. On her first day, a mummified skeleton falls out of the fireplace and Flavia launches her first investigation on foreign soil. Mysteries abound, students appear and disappear, as Flavia slinks from the chemistry lab to the laundry to the nearest grocery seeking clues, a task at which she is expert, while offering appropriate Shakespearean quotes, of course. – Kathy Ashton, Delacorte, $25

River of No Return, David Riley Bertsch
Jackson, Wyoming, in the heart of the High Rockies, may be the most beautiful place on the planet, and some of the wildest and wiliest trout lurk in its river. It takes a canny guide to lure those fish on to hooks and that's where Jake Trent (former high-powered lawyer/government agent/ now professional fishing guide) lives and works. In this second book in Bertsch's delightful series, Jake's former Washington boss needs his help to rescue Jackson's sheriff's wife from a Chinese amusement park that is modeled after the Wyoming town. Why, you say? Because China's Security Chief (sole owner of said park) wants to make the U.S. government arrest his daughter, who lives and works in Jackson and has a legal right (visas, work permits, etc.) to stay there. Complex, yes, but great fun. – Kathy Ashton, Simon & Schuster, $26

Fear the Darkness, Becky Masterman
In her world you're either an amusement, useful, or in her way. Retired FBI agent Brigid Quinn may be stalking 60 but she can still take down a man half her age. Brigid's Tucson-based PI business is humming along, as is her marriage to Carlo. The Quinns have just lost Brigid's sister, and Brigid made a promise to take in her niece, Gemma-Kate. That could be the worst mistake she ever made. Within days of the girl's arrival one of the family pets has fallen ill, and Brigid, investigating the case of a young man drowned in suspicious circumstances is concerned. She confides in her friend Mallory that the girl may have a little too much of the Quinn dark side about her, but Brigid isn't feeling quite like herself either. – Paula Longhurst, Minotaur, $25.99

The Siege Winter, Ariana Franklin and Samantha Norman
In medieval Britain, mercenaries abound and the most skilled among them specialize in a particular weapon. Gwil the arbalist, master of bow and crossbow, is traveling through Britain's fens on foot, when he hears screams coming from a thick stand of rushes. He finds a tiny, red-headed girl, filthy, blood-soaked, shivering with bitter cold and terror, reeking with the foul stench of asafetida. Eventually she understands that Gwil means her no harm. He moves on, his limp little bundle wrapped in his cloak, clutched close to his chest, and nurses her back to health. Once healed, she has no memory of her attack and Gwil raises her as his own son, coaches her to brilliance in archery, mothers her, teaches her the ways of boys, and calls her Penda. What happens next will break your heart, offer you hope, and make you wish for a sequel. – Kathy Ashton, HarperCollins, $26.95

Unbecoming, Rebecca Scherm
Julie is from California, scraping together a living restoring antiques in Paris. Grace is from Garland, Tennessee; she's a wife and a thief. Grace became Julie after her husband and lover were arrested for looting a local country estate—but it goes deeper than that. On the day that the boys are paroled, Grace is terrified that one of them will find her French bolt-hole and come to collect the treasure she absconded with, a treasure she no longer has. How far will she unravel before any survival instinct kicks in? – Paula Longhurst, Viking, $27.95
YOUNG ADULT

Firefight, Brandon Sanderson
The sequel to Steelheart will make you wish for book three. Sanderson draws you into David's battle against the Epics: this time David is accompanying Prof to Babylon Restored to fight the High Epic Regalia. In his heart of hearts he also longs to find Megan in another page-turner, packed with adventure and mysteries. Sanderson is a great world-builder and that talent shines in this book. I couldn't put it down! If you loved Steelheart, you will love Firefight! – Random House, $18.99 (12 and up)

The War that Saved My Life, Kimberly Brubaker Bradley
Ada, who lives with her little brother Jamie and their mother in a London slum, has never been outside because her mother does not want anyone to know about her club foot. When Jamie is sent away because of the German bombs, Ada, too, jumps at the chance to get away—and discovers that the world is a bigger and better place than she had ever imagined. Susan, the woman who is initially forced to take the kids, finds her world has changed for the better, too. When the nasty mom shows up to reclaim the children, or at least their benefits, all of the characters have to figure out what is most important. Historical fiction, adventure, and family story all wrapped up together, this book has a lot of heart. – Penguin, $16.99 (9 and up)

Winnie: The True Story of the Bear Who Inspired Winnie-the-Pooh, Sally Walker
TKE staff loved this book the minute they laid eyes on it. The much-loved tale of Winnie-the-Pooh started when Harry Colebourn, a soldier in the Canadian Army, rescued a baby bear cub. Winnie traveled with Harry all the way to England for training, becoming the mascot of Harry's unit. Winnie became the symbol of the whole war effort, and his adventures were made into books and stories that would inspire the world. The illustrations (Jonathan D. Voss) bring this charming story to life, as do the black and white photos on the end papers. This is a complete package! – Henry Holt, $17.99 (all ages)

Princess Academy: The Forgotten Sisters, Shannon Hale
In this very satisfying conclusion to the Princess Academy trilogy, Miri finds herself, once more, unable to return to her beloved mountain home of Mount Eskel. The king of Asland has demanded that she journey to Lower Alva to become tutor to three sisters who are his Majesty's young cousins. This humid and swampy territory is filled with frightening things, including giant man-eating caimans! Miri's bravery and her skills are put to the ultimate test in a battle that will mean the difference between saving the kingdom or losing her homeland forever. – Anne Holman, Bloomsbury, $17.99 (10 and up)

Lucky Strike, Bobbie Pyron
Nathaniel Harlow has never had an ounce of luck even though his logically-minded best friend, Genesis Beam, reminds him regularly that there is no such thing as luck. But when his eleventh birthday falls on a Saturday for the first time EVER, both Nate and Gen and everyone else in Paradise Beach are in for a big surprise—lots of surprises in fact. A lightning strike during a game of miniature golf changes everything! Nate's grandpa suddenly gets a steady supply of customers wanting to charter him for fishing trips; Nate wins ALL the prizes at the carnival, and the always-last Bay Leaf comes in first in the annual regatta. But has Nate's luck gone too far? Folks in town start to question it and tempers run high. A big storm rolls into town and the events that follow set everyone straight about fear and friendship, and even a little bit of luck. Great read for boys and girls alike! – Anne Holman, Arthur A. Levine, $16.99 (8-12)

Winnie: The True Story of the Bear Who Inspired Winnie-the-Pooh, Sally Walker

TKE staff loved this book the minute they laid eyes on it. The much-loved tale of Winnie-the-Pooh started when Harry Colebourn, a soldier in the Canadian Army, rescued a baby bear cub. Winnie traveled with Harry all the way to England for training, becoming the mascot of Harry's unit. When Harry was assigned to the battlefields on the continent, he realized that Winnie would need a home—Winnie quickly became a London Zoo favorite. Readers can probably guess what happened next. The illustrations (Jonathan D. Voss) bring this charming story to life, as do the black and white photos on the end papers. This is a complete package! – Henry Holt, $17.99 (all ages)

5 Elephants, Rob Laidlow

The challenges of elephants both in captivity and in the wild are explored in this book about five famous elephants. Their stories are intermingled with narrative about preservation, history, and the impact—both negative and positive—that humans have had on these animals. The personal stories of Lucy, Echo, and Tusko, which add so much weight to the discussion about elephants and their place in our world, are supported by many photos and a strong appendix directing the reader to supporting information. – Fitzhenry & Whiteside, $19.95 (10 and up)

Turning 15 on the Road to Freedom, My Story of the 1965 Selma Voting Rights March, Lynda Blackmon Lowery

Lynda Lowery was the youngest person to participate in the 1965 historic march, Selma to Montgomery. Her story is marked by the small and large moments of the journey, everything from sleeping on straw, to hearing Martin Luther King. Lowery’s voice rings true and her saga is a welcome addition to the library of stories that make up the Civil Rights Movement. This book is also beautifully illustrated. – Penguin, $19.99 (12 and up)

The Mysteries of Beethoven’s Hair, Russell Martin and Lydia Nibley

Paul Hiller had written a note on the back of a mysterious locket telling the reader that his father had cut the lock of hair off of Beethoven’s head at the time of his death. Historians and musicians have long been fascinated with Beethoven and his amazing talents, wondering what the explanation for his genius was and what troubles went with it. Martin and Nibley cover the course of Beethoven’s life, the travels of that lock of hair, and the surprising results that came with the scientific examination of the hair. This compelling story is finally in paperback, and well worth reading! – Charlesbridge, $7.95 (10 and up)

I Like You, Susan Stoddard Warburg, illustrated by Jacqueline Chwast

Why do we like the people we do? Is it because they’re silly when we’re silly and sad when we’re sad? Or because it’s the Fourth of July? Or the Fifth? Or do we like them just because? Or for no reason at all? First published in 1965, this small book (featuring a memorable pen-and-ink drawing of a girl and an alligator taking tea together on the front cover) is as charming now as it was then. – Houghton Mifflin, $6.95

Crankenstein Valentine, Samantha Berger, illustrated by Dan Santat

“Roses are red. Violets are blue. Valentine’s Day stinks. Seriously, P.U.” Crankenstein returns in this story about a cranky little monster who dislikes (ick!) a certain holiday dedicated to hearts and flowers. Funny text and funny illustrations make this new book the perfect anti-Valentine. – Little, Brown, $17

Love Monster and the Perfect Present, Rachel Bright

Love Monster has a friend to whom he wants to give the perfect gift. But when he goes shopping, he discovers that “perfect” gifts come with less-than-perfect price tags. What can Love Monster do to show a special friend that he really, really cares? Bright does right in this charming sequel. – Farrar Straus Giroux, $17.99

Three Little Words, Clemency Pearce, illustrated by Rosalind Beardshaw

“When you feel so very small, when no one seems to care at all, what can make you ten feet tall?” The answer, of course, involves “3 little words.” Rhyming text and colorful collages make this simple picture book entirely agreeable for children and their parents. – Double-day, $12.99

Love Always Everywhere, Sarah Massini

Vivid illustrations and spare text celebrate the presence of love in the simplest of activities—petting a cat, building a sandcastle, reading a story, sharing a slice of watermelon. A nice choice for very young children. – Random House, $16.99

Llama Llama I Love You, Anna Dewdney

Fans of the llama llama board book series will enjoy following our character as he gets ready for Valentine’s Day. (Who knew baby llamas look so cute in overalls?) – Viking, $5.99

Everything I Need to Know About Love I Learned from a Little Golden Book, Diane Muldrow

Looking for the perfect valentine for your favorite baby-boomer? Everything I Need to Know About Love . . . features vintage illustrations selected from the pages of everybody’s favorite Golden Books; Muldrow’s upbeat text gives new life to these beloved images. – Golden Books, $9.99

The Hug Book, Sue Fliess, illustrated by Anne Kennedy

And speaking of Golden Books. . . The Hug Book takes a look at all kinds of hugs. Published in 2015, it has the look and feel of classic Golden Book titles. - $3.99
Who Wants a Hug?,
Jeff Mack

“Everyone liked Bear. No one liked Skunk.” Could the reason be that Bear offers free hugs while Skunk hands out free slugs? This good-natured book takes a look at winning friends and influencing people. – Harper Collins, $17.99

Bear Hug,
Katharine McEwen

And speaking of hugs and bears . . . Bear Hug is a circle-of-life story. Bear leaves home. Bear practices the skills he’s learned from his mother. Bear finds another bear. Bears hibernate. Spring arrives and another bear is born. The text is simple but what makes this such an attractive book are McEwen’s collages that capture and celebrate the essence of life’s seasons. – Templar (Candlewick), $15.99

A Castle Full of Cats,
Ruth Sanderson

Beloved illustrator Ruth Sanderson turns her paint and poetry to a King who loves his Queen but is quite besieged by the castle cats. Delightful drawings and a pitch-perfect rhyme scheme make this a perfect book to open in your lap and read with kids and the cats they love. A sweet and silly ending will have your little ones asking to “read it again!” – Anne Holman, Knopf Books for Young Readers, $16.99

The Storied Life of A.J. Fikry, Gabrielle Zevin
A.J. Fikry is a mess. His wife has died and he’s running the bookstore they ran together into the ground. Until, that is, someone leaves a baby in the store, and A.J. ends up a sudden, surrogate parent. If all of this sounds a tad sentimental, it is, in a tinkle-your-funny-bone, make you laugh-‘til-you-cry way. Because A.J.’s a cynic—about people, about books, about the business of books, about romance, and about possibility—a cynic with a well-developed sense of irony and a wonderful literary sensibility. The result? In Zevin’s hands what might have been sentimental is funny. Very funny. And, in the end, superbly satisfying. The Storied Life of A.J. Fikry is fast-moving, feisty in terms of the book business, felicitous in terms of feelings—and for anyone who likes books, or better still, the business of books, it’s a joy. – Betsy Burton, Algonquin Books, $14.95 Editor’s note: Gabrielle Zevin will visit TKE Tuesday, February 24, 7 p.m.

Bark, Lorrie Moore
This beautifully crafted book of stories, Moore’s first since her much-lauded 1998 collection Birds of America, showcases her sharp observations concerning experiences we all face. In “Debarking,” the attempt of a newly divorced man to keep his wits about him during the ominous beginnings of the Iraq War portray the perils of navigating new waters personally and as a nation at war, providing moments of dark humor in the process. “Wings” relates the fate of two talented musicians who did not hold fast to their dreams, detailing the dead ends they encountered as a result and the consequent working out of regret. Some stories are laugh-out-loud funny, others are heart-rending, but all are beautifully wrought and illuminate the human condition. – Jan Sloan, Vintage, $15

All the Birds, Singing, Evie Wyld
Australian fiction has been characterized by a lurid inventiveness of late—witness The Night Guest by Fiona McFarlane. But the tigers who haunt that surreal novel are nothing to the ghosts that haunt Wyld’s protagonist Jake Whyte, who now lives on a wild island in Britain, as far from her Australian past as she can get. Half this searing novel moves forward in time as Jake, isolated in a farmhouse with only her sheep and a dog for company, tries to avoid unwanted guests and to ward off something monstrous—something that is killing her sheep. The other half of the novel, and of Jake’s life, begins with her escape from another monster, this one human, winding gradually, skillfully backward in time to the reason for her scars, both physical and psychic.

The tale both batters and mesmerizes the reader and, like The Night Guest, is as unsettling as it is revelatory, as visually dramatic as it is emotionally opaque. Both novels are hard to read and harder to forget. – Betsy Burton, Vintage, $15.95

And the Dark Sacred Night, Julia Glass
As she did so brilliantly in The Three Junes, Glass succeeds in melting a huge cast of characters into a sublime and velvety-smooth whole: Daphne and Jasper raised three great sons in a tiny northern Vermont ski town; Jasper still lives there with his sled dogs and shows no surprise when Kit comes to stay. Sandra and Kit struggle to raise their twins on too little money and too many secrets; Lucinda and Zeke have lost their way in the wake of Zeke’s stroke as they still mourn the loss of their son Malachy. Fenno, a major character from The Three Junes, is still dispensing calm in the midst of chaos but this new novel doesn’t rely solely on the old. Glass harbors a rare understanding of the human condition, the urges that drive us, what makes us laugh and cry and love and hate and succeed and fail in a story that will keep you up late and make you sad when it ends. One of her favorite writers (and mine) is Robertson Davies; I think if he were still alive, she would be one of his. – Kathy Ashton, Anchor, $15.95

In Paradise, Peter Matthiessen
Matthiessen’s first book since his 2008 National Book Award-winning Shadow Country is set in Poland in 1996 at the site of a former death camp. A group of more than a hundred people have come to bear witness, offering prayers and meditating for a week, on what was at one time the “sorting” platform. Among them is Clements Olin, an American professor who has come to research the apparent suicide of a camp survivor. What ensues is not just a brief look into one of the more horrific times in human history, but also the turmoil wrought when a group of people get together, each with a different agenda. A great insight into the emotions and reasons for participating in what has been billed as a communal experience—and into the human condition. Matthiessen has not lost his ability to transport us with language to an entirely new plane. – Jan Sloan, Penguin/Riverhead Press, $16

See You in Paradise: Stories, J. Robert Lennon
Considering that the 14 stories collected in See You in Paradise were written over a period of 15 years, the consistency of J. Robert Lennon’s work is impressive. In the best of the stories here, he mixes the mundane with the surreal, the domestic with the fantastic, the bleak with the comedic. Highlights include stories about: a backyard magic portal that doesn’t work quite right; the transformative power of a hibachi grill in the home; the unforeseen dangers of revivifying dead loved ones; and changes at home when a wife's unhappiness takes on its own bodily form. These stories won't wow you with their plots but even the weakest ones are so funny and entertaining that it's easy to overlook any shortcomings.
